

Satidaha Pratha in English

Sati was a custom in which a man's wife would sacrifice herself after her husband's death. This custom was prevalent in some ancient communities.

Raja Ram Mohan Roy and Law William Bettink's Park Md. in ending the practice of Sati.
Attempts to end the practice of Sati

Raja Ram Mohan Roy, known as the 'Bengal Renaissance', opposed the practice of Sati.

Lord Will Bayam, in 1829, passed the Bengal Sati Regulation. Through this act, the practice of Sati was abolished throughout India.

In 1987, the Sati (Prevention) Act was passed. Through this act, Sati was changed to a crime and this was punishable by death.

Some more information about the practice of Sati

Accurate information about the practice of Sati is not available.

Attempts were made to implement the practice of Sati during the Mughal period as well.

Edit